Course Overview: This course reconceptualises film adaptation beyond fidelity, treating it as a transformative, intertextual practice shaped by narrative form, authorship, and ideology. It examines how adaptations negotiate power through gender, caste, race, and postcolonial translation, and explores global circulation through Shakespearean adaptations. Focusing on cinematic narration, collaborative authorship, and screenwriting as interpretation, the course situates adaptation within Indian cinema’s regional and national contexts. It also analyses genre shifts, popular culture, and audience reception, enabling students to critically understand adaptation as a dynamic process of cultural transformation across media and contexts.
Course Outcome:
Remember key concepts, theories, and terminologies related to film adaptation, including fidelity criticism, intertextuality, and narrative structures.
Understand adaptation as a transformative and ideological process shaped by medium, authorship, and cultural contexts such as gender, caste, race, and postcoloniality.
Apply theoretical frameworks to interpret adaptations across literary and cinematic forms, including Shakespearean and Indian texts.
Analyze narrative strategies, authorship models, and genre shifts in adapted works, with attention to regional, national, and global dimensions.
Evaluate adaptations critically by examining their ideological positions, cultural translations, and audience reception.
Create original critical arguments or adaptation proposals that demonstrate nuanced engagement with theory, form, and context.
Prerequisites: Knowledge about film and literature. Some familiarity with film and cultural theory as well as narrative forms.
